

Negative language used within a given identity group about itself and its own members is very different from the same language used by people outside the group—though such usage is also often objectionable to group members.

“Fun” lingo that bonds friends in social settings can polarize groups into dominant/non-dominant camps in the workplace setting.